I am saddened to read that the park service is entertaining the idea of installing cellular phone equipment in Yellowstone National Park. Although cellular towers may represent something less of an eye sore than miles upon miles of physical cable being strung or buried, they are in my opinion another step towards paving the wild america.

I would bet that most people who come to the park relish the fact that services are limited (but adequate) as they attempt to witness the magic that has charmed man for ages. Do modern man a favor, make sure that if they answer a call it is the call of the wild (to be in harmony with his surroundings), NOT A CELL PHONE!

>> End of question.
